Baskets, beads, blankets, and banks may sound like an odd combination, but these items, along with artifacts from significant archaeological dig sites in Seaside, Oregon come together to demonstrate one man’s passion for collecting. Native Treasures: The Legacy Collection of Robert M. Drucker is the newest temporary exhibit at the Heritage Museum and is open for viewing until October 31, 2012.

Among the extensive collection, which consists of more than 1,700 pieces, are the bone and stone tools Mr. Drucker unearthed during his archaeological work at dig sites in Seaside.

Mr. Drucker began excavating the Par-Tee site (named due to its location next to a Seaside golf course) in the mid-1960s with the assistance of the Oregon Archaeological Society. During these early years a collections assistant at the Smithsonian, George Phebus, took notice of Drucker’s efforts. Realizing the archaeological significance of the site, he convinced Drucker and the crew to excavate in a grid system, record provenience information for artifacts and to take some notes. More importantly, Phebus arranged for the Smithsonian to radiocarbon date the site and curate the artifacts and faunal remains that were recovered.

Radiocarbon dating results indicate the site was occupied from around 2,000 to 1,000 years ago. At some point during the site’s history, portions of it were used as a burial location. The remains of a minimum of thirty-one individuals were recovered. In 2005, the National Museum of Natural History, Smithsonian Institution commissioned Mr. Drucker to collect baskets from diverse native cultures of western North America. From the Eskimo in northern Alaska to the Pima in southern Arizona.

Native Treasures: The Legacy Collection of Robert M. Drucker
In 2005 the bicentennial of the Lewis and Clark Corps of Discovery thrust Clatsop County into the national spotlight, resulting in a positive and greatly needed economic impact. In 2011 the opportunity for national attention arrived again with the bicentennial of the founding of Astoria. Granted, the founding of Astoria is significant locally, but nationally?

The Corps of Discovery had shown the way, but Asto’s fur trading post gave the young Republic its first permanent settlement on the shores of the Pacific Ocean and, arguably, effected the ultimate destiny and shape of our nation. A tall claim perhaps, but it is ours and one worth celebrating.

And so we did. The Clatsop County Historical Society took the lead in planning a year-long celebration marking the significance of Asto’s bold enterprise at the mouth of the Columbia River. This spring those efforts were recognized.

Noting that Astoria’s Bicentennial was a “highly-organized” celebration of the culture and history of the oldest U. S. settlement west of the Rocky Mountains resulting in “record-high media coverage and an increase in visitors to the area, positively impacting the local economy,” the Oregon Tourism Commission, dba Travel Oregon, presented The Oregon Heritage Tourism Award to the Astoria Bicentennial Committee and Celebration at the 2012 Governor’s Conference on Tourism March 18-20. The award recognizes outstanding use of Oregon’s cultural or natural history by an Oregon individual, organization, business, community or region, to draw visitors to the state.

At the annual Oregon Heritage Commission dinner April 27th, CCHS Executive Director Mac Burns along with Paulette McCoy, Astoria Bicentennial Committee Director, accepted an Oregon Heritage Excellence Award recognizing the Astoria Bicentennial Celebration for its year-long success marking Astoria’s 200 years of history and heritage. Also recognized with an Oregon Heritage Award for her efforts in “preserving, promoting, and disseminating the history of Clatsop County and for fostering an appreciation for local history” was CCHS Archivist Liisa Penner.

The Daily Astorian writes, “Penner is a true pioneer and leader in her field. The legacy she has preserved will be cherished forever.”

Navajo, Makah, Pima, and Apache to name a few. The objects include ceremonial masks, clothing, rugs, pipes, jewelry, fishing tools, pottery, and more.

His other collecting efforts went in a completely different direction. He collected more than 175 vintage cast iron banks, thirty-four of which have mechanical features.

Originally made during the mid-19th century to promote saving among children, these cleverly designed banks quickly caught on and were soon sought-after collector items among children and adults alike. Each bank performs a stunt or action. For example, a circus dog jumping through a hoop held by a clown or William Tell shooting the apple off the head of a young boy.

Many of the banks depict historical, legendary or everyday events making them desirable to a variety of collectors. Little could the young savers have predicted that their banks would some day be more valuable than the few pennies once held within.

Visitors to the Heritage Museum during the exhibit can try out a few of the banks; just remember that your pennies are gratefully accepted as a donation.

Another activity, primarily for the younger visitors, is the sample archeological dig site. Participants are encouraged to uncover their own artifact and note from which location within the grid area it was found. They are allowed to keep the object as a souvenir.

Mr. Drucker continued his interest in Native American culture by collecting a variety of objects. The collection includes baskets, beads, and blankets with baskets being the larger portion there of. He added additional items of interest from more than thirty-three diverse native cultures including Tlingit, Haida, Hupa, Hopi, Navajo, Makah, Pima, and Apache to name a few. The objects include ceremonial masks, clothing, rugs, pipes, jewelry, fishing tools, pottery, and more.

For years the music room in the Flavel House Museum has been illuminated by a large and ornate chandelier; one which originally hung in the Astoria Savings Bank building that now serves as Astoria City Hall.

Historical Society member John Goodenberger has written an article for the Well Preserved column in the May issue of Coast River Business Journal chronicling the recent renovation of the City Hall building. The following is an excerpt from the article regarding the history of the chandelier and of the return to its original home.

Astoria City Hall

The Astoria Savings Bank served the community for nearly three decades. Like so many other businesses, it imploded in the Great Depression and never recovered. Its building stood empty for another decade before the City of Astoria moved its offices there on April 1, 1939.

Why the city would move its offices from its spacious quarters, now the Heritage Museum, to a cramped bank is anyone’s guess. The city struggled to reconcile its spatial requirements for 70 years…until now.

City Manager, Paul Benoit, conceived a plan to make the building more user friendly. In addition to better traffic flow, the building’s historic features—rather than being incidental—are re-incorporated into the experience.

The light fixture

Fred C. Baker, a Northwest lighting designer, created the fixture. Baker designed light fixtures for Timberline Lodge, Portland’s Pittock Mansion, Hollywood Theater, and US Bank—which has fixtures nearly identical to Astoria’s City Hall. He also designed lights for Astoria’s Liberty Theater.

The light exited the building during a 1949 remodel and reappeared in the music room of the Capt. George Flavel Museum. It graced the space for 62 years.

Then, the Clatsop County Historical Society board recognized a need to return the light to its original location, “It was the right thing to do,” said director Mac Burns. “The City was restoring the feel of the historic building and the light fixture was a key element. We’re thrilled it was returned to a place of prominence.”

It was disassembled, polished, reassembled and rewired to code. The light now hangs centered above the city’s logo in the front lobby.

Question Answered

Thanks to a generous donation and unlimited patience from longtime member and volunteer Rae Groforth, the Flavel House Museum’s original kitchen now has a new copper sink and wood counter top.

The original sink had been removed long ago when the kitchen, pantry, and wood room were converted to a small apartment for a caretaker and his family. Unfortunately it was discarded and no photo or description of it survived.
